1. Regional Performance

Sales performance varies across regions, with South showing the highest sales, while East has the lowest sales among the four regions. The comparison with regional targets also shows performance gaps, particularly in West and East. Management should investigate the reasons for these regional differences and replicate successful practices from stronger regions in underperforming areas.

2. Impact of Discounts

The Discount vs Profit analysis shows the relationship between discount levels and profitability. Higher discounting should be carefully monitored because increasing discounts can affect profit margins. Management should use targeted discounts for selected products and customers rather than applying high discounts broadly.

3. Top Product Contribution

A relatively small number of products contribute significantly to overall sales. Tables Product 2, Paper Product 8, and Accessories Product 5 are among the strongest products by sales. Management should maintain adequate inventory for high-performing products and support them through appropriate marketing and promotional activities.

4. Customer and Segment Performance

Customer and segment analysis shows that sales contribution differs across Consumer, Corporate, and Home Office customers. The Top Customers analysis also identifies a smaller group of high-value customers. Management should use segment-specific marketing, customer retention, and cross-selling strategies to increase customer value and strengthen relationships with high-performing customers.

5. Shipping Efficiency

Shipping performance varies across regions based on the calculated number of shipping days. Regions with longer shipping durations may require further investigation of fulfillment and logistics processes. Improving shipping efficiency can help reduce delays, improve the customer experience, and support repeat business.

Overall Conclusion

The Tableau analysis shows that business performance depends on several interconnected factors: regional sales, product contribution, customer value, discount decisions, and shipping efficiency. Management should focus on strengthening weaker regions, protecting high-performing products and customers, controlling discounts based on profitability, and improving shipping performance.
